June Is Bustin' Out All Over

As we have been saying: “Buy In May and Sell By Labor Day” because the market and select stocks are breaking to record all-time highs!

The moves are primarily in Technology and Tech-related companies connected to artificial intelligence (AI) – but not only in these areas. [See 11 stock charts later in this report.] So, what’s driving the breakouts? Inflation data last week from the Consumer Price Index (CPI) and Producer Price Index (PPI) was much better than feared. We also got an uptick in initial jobless claims – which suggests that the employment backdrop could be slowing, especially since the unemployment rate also had a slight uptick, to 4%. This soft economic data drove interest rates down, sparking last week’s strong breakouts. In our view, interest rates have peaked for this cycle – so expect rates to continue to trend lower. We continue to believe the Federal Reserve (Fed) will look to lower the Fed Funds rate before the presidential election in November.

Apple Gets Juiced To A Record High, Finally!

Apple (AAPL) has been in a consolidation since late 2021, but at its recent developer conference, CEO Tim Cook delivered new products and services, particularly in AI – and that got the market juiced about Apple again. Add Apple to the AI breakout list. And expect significant higher highs for Apple as it will compete near-term with Microsoft (MSFT) to be the largest company in the world.

Wilshire 5000 Reaches Record High

The Wilshire 5000 index (which most people never hear about) has had a major breakout and reaches record highs. Why is this important? This index measures the full market capitalization of the equity market. So, the breakout is a clear indication that the market remains in a secular bull trend!

Volatility Low – So Bucking Can Continue

Volatility remains near extremely low levels. The VIX index is near 12 and, historically, when it approaches this level, down to 10, there can be pullbacks in the equity market. We remain buyers on pullbacks. Saddle up!

We Didn't Start The Fire, But We're Ready To Cook

This week, data on the consumer, housing & manufacturing could move the markets.

Summer begins for real this week, and we already have a head start on the markets warming up for seasonal heat. On Tuesday, we'll get a fresh read on how consumers are spending with the release of new retail sales data. Are consumers continuing to be very selective in what they're purchasing? They should be pleased with lower crude oil prices – and that should keep them spending. On the housing front, the recent higher mortgages rates at 7% seem to have been slowing down the market – so, the data out this week will give us a peek into the summer slump – or will there a surprise pop for the housing market? We will also get data on how manufacturing is doing – and all of these reports will get color-commentary as even more Fed Speak heats the airwaves.

Because markets are overbought and volatility is low, we're wary that any data or Fed comments could be market moving this week. If the heat gets turned up, remember to hydrate. Stay cool.
